I paint what I recall and see day-to-day by referencing classical pictorial images from Japan, China and other countries.

I try to retain all the momentum and freshness of the lines and shapes of the subject while I paint.

The act of painting fills the canvas fragment by fragment.

Through the intricate construction of such fragmented images, a new landscape as a whole image emerges on the canvas.

I enjoy such a process.

In recent years, we have often witnessed disasters.

Sometimes, I feel the power and abundance of nature are a threat.

Such threats also become an element in the paintings, accumulating with time and forming the landscape.
